THE CHRISTIAN VIEW.

Concluded from Second Page. the relation there suggested, I cannot understand.

I will not quote Matthew over-quoted theory about wom n' ing taken from the left side near the door of the heart. I think she was taken from the right side and under the right arm, suggestive that he was to fight her battles for her and be her unfailing defense, and strike down her assailants and avenge her honor. That is what fills a man with indignation unbounded and makes him livid with rage when you say anything against his wife. You may abuse him, you may cheat him, you may defraud him, you may insult him, and he will forgive you; but you say anything against his wife-if you propose to do it -- you had better stand out from his side! That they might walk the path of life together. That she might be his care, his angelic ministry. To him the best thing in all the earth. From his side! Oh, the tenderness, and the pathos, and the beauty, and the sublimity of the Mossic account.

You have only to hear him at the edge of the grave or at the edge of the coffin, discoursing, to find out that there is no comfort in infidelity. There is more good cheer in the kooting of of an owl at midnight than in his discourse at the verge of the grave. You might as well ask the spirit of eternal darkness to discourse on the brightness of everlasting day. You know there are millions of people who get their chief consolation from this Holy Book. Now Mr. Ingersoll proposes to take away toat consolation. What do you think of it? What would you think of a crusade of this sort?
